

What Works...

...for children with speech, language and communication needs?

For the first time in the sector, a website brings together the evidence base for speech, language and communication needs (SLCN) interventions to help you find the most appropriate support for the children and young people you work with.

The Communication Trust has worked with the Better Communication Research Programme to develop the What Works. This is a free to access database of evidenced interventions to support positive outcomes in children's speech, language and communication.

'It collects in one place information and evidence about all the approaches I use. Finally!'

What Works is endorsed by the Royal College of Speech and Language Therapists and currently contains 60 interventions. We're now rolling out a year-long programme of consultation with key stakeholders and practitioners.

Please help us spread the word!

We want as many people as possible to know about the site and to tell us what they think about it. We would be very grateful if you could pass this flyer to your colleagues and peers through local, regional and national networks.

Who should you use this resource?

What Works is available for practitioners who make decisions about what interventions to use in their setting, such as:

- headteachers
- teachers
- speech and language therapists
- other specialist staff

Once you have registered and used the site, please complete our short online questionnaire to let us know your thoughts so that we can improve the site in the future.
